Introduction

1. The Working Group on the Universal Periodic Review (UPR), established in accordance with Human Rights Council resolution 5/1 of 18 June 2007, held its tenth session from 24 January to 4 February 2011. The review of Oman was held at the 5th meeting on 26 January 2011. The delegation of Oman was headed by the Minister Responsible for Foreign Affairs, His Excellency, Yusef bin Alawi bin Abdulla. At its 9th meeting held on 28 January 2011, the Working Group adopted the report on Oman
2. On 21 June 2010, the Human Rights Council selected the following group of rapporteurs (troika) to facilitate the review of Oman: Burkina Faso, Jordan and Spain.
3. In accordance with paragraph 15 of the annex to resolution 5/1, the following documents were issued for the review of Oman:
 - (a) A national report submitted and a written presentation made in accordance with paragraph 15 (a) (A/HRC/WG.6/10/OMN/1);
 - (b) A compilation prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) in accordance with paragraph 15 (b) (A/HRC/WG.6/9/OMN/2);
 - (c) A summary prepared by OHCHR in accordance with paragraph 15 (c) (A/HRC/WG.6/9/OMN/3).
4. A list of questions prepared in advance by Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Latvia, Netherlands, Norway, Slovenia Sweden and the United Kingdom was transmitted to Oman through the troika. These questions are available on the extranet of the UPR.

I. Summary of the proceedings of the review process

A. Presentation by the State under review

5. The Sultanate of Oman expressed its gratitude and appreciation to the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, to the members of the Working Group and to the Troika for the efficient work they had undertaken in preparing the review session.
6. Oman noted that it had accorded priority to human welfare ever since the country's great renaissance in 1970 under the enlightened leadership of His Majesty Sultan Qaboos bin Said.
7. The Council of Ministers of Oman had set up a ministerial committee to oversee the drafting of the national report. The Committee was expected to continue its work in the future, monitoring the outcome of the UPR review and following up on it within the Sultanate's human rights system. Oman reaffirmed at workshops held with civil society the importance of their involvement in the UPR process by submitting direct reports to the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, providing input for the national report and, in the longer term, playing a role in monitoring the UPR recommendations at the national level.
8. The Oman Basic Law promulgated in 1996 laid down the basic principles and criteria of human dignity and freedom, equal rights and equality of opportunity for all without discrimination.
9. The preparation of the UPR report coincided with the fortieth anniversary celebrations in Oman. This occasion was a motivating factor to work hard to produce an objective account of achievements in terms of legislation, institutions and policies aimed at guaranteeing a high living standard, human dignity and freedom. It had also motivated the Sultanate to identify areas in which a greater effort was required to fully achieve its aspirations and ambitions.

10. In the past four decades, Oman had been laying solid foundations for a modern State based on citizenship, institution-building, the rule of law, justice and equality, as well as the cultural and civilizational values of Omani society.

11. Oman had ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child and its two Optional Protocols; the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination; the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women; and the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. Oman was working to prepare its reports to the relevant treaty bodies.

12. Oman intended to consider signing additional treaties and to review some of its reservations to articles of the treaties it has ratified. Oman announced that it had decided to withdraw four of its reservations to the Convention on the Rights of the Child and to limit the scope of its fifth and final reservation. Oman expressed its appreciation to the expertise of the United Nations different treaty bodies for their recommendations and to the Special Rapporteur on trafficking in persons.

13. The legislative and institutional developments provided evidence of the fact that Oman had succeeded, in a relatively brief period of time, in establishing the requisite legal structure at the national level to embed human rights principles in its national legislation and in its institutions.

14. Oman provided quantitative indicators of the advances made in the last four decades in the areas of education, health services, average life expectancy and average infant mortality. These achievements had resulted in being ranked as the first country in the world in terms of the pace of progress achieved in the areas of health and education, according to the 2010 United Nations Human Development Report.

15. Oman's Government had taken major steps, at the very highest level, to encourage women to pursue educational opportunities, to join both public and private sector employment, and to become involved in all social and economic fields. Omani women occupied ministerial positions in the government and senior management posts in business firms, serving in some cases as chief executive officer. With a view to supporting and consolidating these advances, 17 October of each year had been declared Omani Women's Day.

16. His Majesty the Sultan, in his address on the occasion of the opening of the second session of the Shura Council in 1994, called on "Omani women everywhere, in villages and towns, in urban areas and in the countryside, on the plains and in the mountains, to rally their forces and contribute to economic and social development, each according to her individual abilities, potential, expertise, skills and position in society", adding that "the homeland needed all citizens to join forces in the onward march towards progress, growth, stability and prosperity", and that women played a vital role in society.

17. Oman had updated its legislation and adopted numerous measures aimed at protecting the rights of the various components of the labour force. The Ministry of Labour, in coordination with representatives of the private sector and the trade unions, was keen to take advantage, on an ongoing basis, of the expertise of the International Labour Organization so that it could take additional steps to update legal provisions and to implement best practices in order to safeguard the rights of employers and employees.

18. Oman had enacted the Law on Combating Human Trafficking and set up a National Committee to prepare reports, draw up national plans, make recommendations and take the necessary steps to counteract the growing global phenomenon of human trafficking to address certain undesirable practices in both sending and receiving countries concerning the exploitation of workers for the purposes of human trafficking.

19. Oman had established a National Human Rights Commission to perform oversight and assessment tasks and monitor the human rights situation on the ground. Oman had already made a commitment to ensure that it was functioning in accordance with the Paris Principles.

20. Oman had taken major steps forward and made extraordinary progress over the past 40 years by promoting awareness, enacting laws and building institutions aimed at achieving the best possible outcome. The goal of consolidating the national human rights system constituted an ongoing task for Oman.

B. Interactive dialogue and responses by the State under review

21. During the interactive dialogue, 51 delegations made statements. A number of delegations thanked Oman for its constructive participation, openness and willingness to cooperate in the universal periodic review process and acknowledged Oman's efforts in the promotion and protection of human rights. Active dialogue with civil society during the preparation of the national report was positively noted. Additional statements which could not be delivered during the interactive dialogue owing to time constraints are posted on the Extranet of the universal periodic review when available¹ Recommendations made during the dialogue are to be found in section II of the present report.

22. Qatar noted that in the past few decades Oman had succeeded in establishing a well developed legal system for the protection of human rights, and that the main provisions in this regard were contained in the Basic Law. Oman had also created an institutional framework, including the national human rights commission. The right to development, and particularly human development, were at the centre of national policies. This had enabled Oman to realize social and economic rights, in particular for women and children, and in the areas of health and education.

23. Saudi Arabia highlighted major developments which had taken place in Oman over the past few decades and had led to a better protection and promotion of human rights, both at the legal and the institutional level. Saudi Arabia particularly commended achievements in the area of education and in spreading a human rights culture in the different segments of Omani society.

24. The United Arab Emirates (UAE) commended the integration of fundamental human rights principles in the Omani Constitution and legislation, in line with international instruments. It also appreciated the achievements in the economic, social and cultural fields, noting that, according to UNDP, Oman ranked among the top ten countries internationally with regard to the pace of progress in education and health in the past few decades. UAE also commented on the importance placed by Oman on combating human trafficking.

25. Bahrain noted that Oman had taken a number of policies to promote human rights, in particular the right to education and women's rights, and commended that education was provided free of charge for all citizens. Awareness-raising on human rights was part of the general education and the work of the media. Bahrain also highlighted the importance given to the advancement of women, citing examples of high level posts occupied by women in government and legislative bodies.

26. Algeria commended the attention devoted by Oman to the problem of human trafficking and to the right to development. It also highlighted achievements in the areas of health and education and with regard to the rights of women and children as well as migrant workers. Algeria also noted Oman's role at the international level in taking initiatives related to road safety and the fighting of disease. Algeria further drew attention to the voluntary pledges which Oman had entered into in its report.

27. Kuwait highlighted achievements in the promotion and protection of human rights over the past 40 years, including in particular the right to development, including human development. During that period, schools had been built throughout the country, literacy programmes had been implemented and Oman University had been established. Kuwait further drew attention to the establishment of the national human rights commission, which worked to promote and protect human rights.

28. Turkey welcomed the promulgation of the Basic Law and the establishment of the National Commission for Human Rights. It appreciated efforts to prevent misconduct against expatriate workers and protect their rights. It noted efforts to provide equal opportunities and develop an open society as well as the launching of an electronic voting system facilitating universal suffrage for the Shura Council elections next October.

29. Morocco noted that Oman had a comprehensive legal framework strengthened by accession to the major international human rights instruments and that it had made strong efforts in consolidating cooperation with the international institutions. It also highlighted the role of civil society in the development process, and the attention paid to the rights of women and their participation in public life, as well as the tolerant approach in interacting with a large number of migrant workers from different countries and cultures.

30. Egypt highlighted the priority given by Oman to building an effective institutional framework comprising the national commission for human rights and the national committee to combat human trafficking. Egypt commended Oman's efforts in fighting human trafficking and assisting victims. It appreciated efforts undertaken to protect the rights of women and children as well as persons with disabilities. It welcomed Oman's accession to a number of human rights instruments, such as CRC and its optional protocols, and the fact that Oman was studying the possibility of acceding to ICCPR.

31. Iraq noted that Oman had acceded to a number of international human rights instruments, and that their principles and provisions were reflected in Omani legislation, including with regard to the separation of powers, the rule of law, the independence of the judiciary, and respect for fundamental rights and freedoms. Iraq also highlighted efforts to fight human trafficking as well as the fact that Oman had acceded to the Arab Human Rights Charter. Iraq appreciated Oman's achievements in the health sector and in the area of child rights, and its ratification of CRPD.

32. Azerbaijan welcomed measures taken to prevent human trafficking and assist victims. It noted that UNDP's recent Human Development Report had placed Oman among the world's ten leading countries regarding progress made over the past decades in education, health and other public sectors. It commended steps encouraging women to participate fully and equally in all spheres of life, amendments to the Law on Passports, the protection of women in labour relations and the establishment of consultative centers for women. It welcomed the establishment of the National Committee concerned with follow-up and implementation of the Convention of the Rights of the Child.

33. Mauritania noted that Oman had taken major steps with regard to the promotion and protection of human rights and expressed its appreciation for Oman's achievements and its continuing efforts in this regard. Mauritania was confident that Oman would continue on this path, with due regard to the values and customs which suited Omani society.

34. India acknowledged progress regarding women and children, and in the areas of health and education. It noted the significant reduction of infant and under-five mortality rates and the increase in elected representation in Government. Efforts made to establish a legal infrastructure included the National Human Rights Commission and the National Committee for Combating Human Trafficking. While noting measures in favour of domestic servants and temporary workers, India encouraged Oman to consider bringing them within the scope of the Labour Law, thereby ensuring their basic rights.

35. The Islamic Republic of Iran noted the establishment of the National Human Rights Commission, the National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking and the National Committee for following up the implementation of the CRC. It noted Oman's outstanding progress in health, employment, welfare and education sectors. Iran further noted effective measures for the promotion and protection of the persons with disabilities including the consultative centers for women, families and marriage guidance.

36. Canada noted the establishment of a National Committee to Combat Trafficking in Persons and legislation regarding the rights of domestic migrant workers, as well as the care provided for persons with disabilities. It noted several challenges, including legislation limiting freedom of expression, particularly the internet and the press, prevalence of discrimination and the lack of mechanisms of protection against domestic violence and forced marriage. The judiciary, though independent, remained subordinate to the executive and subject to its influence.

37. Sri Lanka highlighted progress in relation to women and children and in the fields of health and education. It noted that the Civil Service Law of 2004 guaranteed equal rights and duties for public sector employees without gender discrimination for both citizens and non-citizens. It welcomed the new Labour Law, which defined terms and conditions for expatriate workers in the private sector and encouraged Oman to bring domestic workers under this law. It welcomed Oman's signature of the MOU with countries that supply labour and encouraged it to further strengthen implementation of this Ministerial Decision.

38. Venezuela highlighted that WHO had listed Oman among the leading countries of the world in providing comprehensive primary health care and in terms of the effectiveness of the whole health system financed by the Government of up to 80 percent. It also noted an increase in average life expectancy and a significant drop in the mortality rate. Concerning treatment of non-communicable diseases Oman guarantees free health care from basic care through to tertiary health care, including rehabilitation and social inclusion.

39. Oman responded to questions and enquiries of Member States made during the interactive dialogue, noting that its legislation guaranteed the rights of all, in accordance with the Basic Law, and provided equality for all citizens before the law, while prohibiting discrimination between them. Omani legislation did not allow violence against women, guaranteed respect for women's dignity and forbade behaviour which was not acceptable in Oman's society, noting that such acts of violence were punishable under the Criminal Code and that appropriate remedies existed in the courts. Sexual harassment was also punishable under the appropriate provisions of the Criminal Code.

40. It was also noted that there was no discrimination with regard to political participation of women, who had the right to nominate themselves to be elected to the Consultative Council (Majlis el-Shura). Women participated in political life as members of the Cabinet and the State Office.

41. Oman stressed that it had been a State party to the CRC since 1996 and to the two optional protocols since 2004. Oman had established a committee to oversee the implementation of the Convention and its optional protocol, and it was drafting a law on the rights of children that would guarantee the protection of all rights of children, and the provision of services to them, including children born out of wedlock.

42. Oman noted that it had collected data on cases of disabilities, through the population censuses of 2003 and 2010. The 2008 Law on the rights of the disabled provided many rights, including the right to employment at a minimum quota of 1 percent in the government administrative sector and 2 percent in the private sector in enterprises with a number of employees exceeding 50 persons. Oman had 33 non-governmental centers working on a voluntary base and supported by the government in order to provide the daily services to those with disabilities. Oman hoped to establish more centers of this type.
43. Under the Basis Law, school education was free of charge for all children living in Oman. This had also contributed to enrolment rates of over 90 percent in primary schools, over 80 percent at the preparatory level and almost 80 percent in secondary schools.
44. Oman noted that it paid special attention to the education of children with disabilities and that there were three specialized schools, for the visually impaired, the deaf, and the mute. Specialized teachers helped these children to attain better integration in the community. A national plan for the integration of children with disabilities in the public schools had been adopted in early 2000.
45. Democratic People's Republic of Korea underlined Oman's achievements in areas such as education and health. As recognized by UNDP, Oman was one of the world's leading countries regarding progress made in education and health in recent decades. It noted that constant efforts were being made in the area of women's empowerment, as demonstrated by increased numbers of women in major public posts.
46. France noted with satisfaction measures taken to promote human rights, particularly the establishment of a National Human Rights Commission. Acknowledging significant efforts to improve women's status, France noted continued gender inequality regarding the ability to pass on citizenship, and the vulnerability of women and children to domestic violence. It also noted restrictions of the freedom of association and the freedom of expression, referring to censorship of newspapers and publications deemed politically or culturally offensive.
47. Spain acknowledged efforts made and urged Oman to continue consolidating the legal framework for the protection and promotion of human rights. It congratulated Oman on its determination to reach the second MDG regarding the right to free education for all citizens, and to reduce the level of illiteracy in the country.
48. Jordan noted that Oman had made considerable progress for instance in the area of economic, social and cultural rights, in particular in the areas of health and education. Jordan also appreciated progress in the area of civil and political rights, including with regard to the freedom of expression and opinion and related developments in the legislative framework concerning the media.
49. Slovenia noted Oman's progress in the areas of juvenile justice, forced labor, human rights education and human trafficking, as well as the fast decline in under-five mortality. While commending the number of voluntary pledges, it noted a number of challenges in the area of civil and political rights, including discrimination and violence against women, and regarding the rights of children and migrant workers.
50. Yemen appreciated the progress made by Oman in a relatively short period in the human rights area. It noted that Oman had built the necessary legal framework to implement human rights principles at the national level, especially with regard to the rights of women and children. Yemen welcomed that Oman had made such progress based on the preservation of the specificities and social values of Oman, while benefiting from the experience and best practices of others.
51. Indonesia noted increased efforts to make human rights awareness a core part of the national education system. It noted that human trafficking was becoming a significant challenge for the Sultanate and commended Oman's efforts to tackle this issue with the seriousness it deserved. Indonesia shared concerns voiced by various stakeholders that the National Human Rights Commission was not yet accredited by the International Coordinating Committee.

52. Lebanon noted that Oman had taken major steps towards the promotion of human rights with the creation of the national commission for human rights and the committee to combat human trafficking. In recent years, Oman had made concrete achievement in different areas related to economic, social and cultural rights. Lebanon particularly commended initiatives for the empowerment of Omani women and the promotion of their participation in the Consultative Council (majlis el-shura) and in the economic sphere.

53. Libyan Arab Jamahyria commended the achievements regarding, inter alia, the rights to health and education, the right to work, and the freedom of opinion and expression. Libya also appreciated the efforts made by the national commission for human rights in raising awareness concerning human rights in all regions of the country. It further welcomed the lifting of reservations to CRC.

54. Malaysia commended Oman for major strides particularly in the area of legislative reform and socio-economic development, including increased investment in education, health, training and social services, and for its proactive stance in advancing the rights of women and children. It welcomed Oman's intention to withdraw its reservations to the CRC and noted its seriousness in addressing the scourge of human trafficking and issues related to migrant workers.

55. Singapore commended Oman for its support to the rights of women, children of ethnic minorities and the disabled. It also noted that Oman's high ranking in the UNDPs 2010 Human Development Report as a testament to the great strides that the nation had made in social development and economic progress, leading to significant improvement in healthcare and education. It noted that fighting terrorism was one of the main challenges today and that Oman had made tremendous achievements in this respect.

56. Bangladesh noted Oman's economic growth and efforts in the area of governance and free education and health care. It further noted measures to reduce gender disparity, including in educational levels, as well as the increased life expectancy. Bangladesh welcomed the existence of an administrative court, a functioning human rights institution and guarantees for the enjoyment of religious rights. It noted that the national committee for combating human trafficking provided safeguards against trafficking and forced labour. It commended efforts regarding the welfare of expatriate workers and the constitutional recognition of the family as basis of society.

57. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland was pleased to note the confirmation concerning the lifting of reservations to CRC. It welcomed the work in combating discrimination against women, including the designation of an official Omani Women's day, and Oman's ratification of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities. The United Kingdom was concerned that some aspects of the domestic law still allowed for discrimination against women and migrant workers. It encouraged Oman to address concerns by the Committee of the Rights of the Child during the preparation of the new Draft Law of the Child. The United Kingdom strongly encouraged Oman to sign both CAT and its Optional Protocol.

58. Oman noted that freedom of expression and opinion were guaranteed for all. The media, the press and other media were devoted to the development of the country as a whole. This is why Oman had been ranked 19th in the world according to the global report on information development for 2009-2010. The number of newspapers, magazines and periodicals had increased to over 80. The private sector had started creating private radio and television stations. There was also a continuing increase in the number of internet sites that offer services in full freedom and transparency. Oman asserted that no person was imprisoned for expressing an opinion as long as certain principles and rules were respected. Oman continually worked on aligning its legislation with ratified instruments.

59. On the question regarding granting citizenship to children as a way to prevent statelessness, the law provided that Omani citizenship is granted to the child of an Omani woman if the father is with unknown citizenship, but that the child takes the citizenship of the father, whether he is Omani or not, if the father is of a known citizenship.

60. Chad noted with satisfaction the importance Oman accorded to the UPR, which allowed States, in regular intervals, to analyze their progress made in the protection of human rights owing to the comments and recommendations of other States.

61. Brazil welcomed the improvements in life expectancy, mortality, and literacy rates. It commended Oman for its substantial voluntary pledges, including with regard to accession to international instruments and the withdrawal of reservations. It noted that the situation faced by migrant workers was still one of concern. The sponsorship system made them vulnerable to abuse and mistreatment, including trafficking. Domestic workers were particularly vulnerable. The situation of women still required improvements, particularly in the rules on marriage, divorce and child custody. Children born out of wedlock still faced serious vulnerabilities.

62. The Philippines acknowledged Oman's legal infrastructure and its progress in the area of health development, including comprehensive primary health care services. It welcomed efforts to increase women's involvement and participation in public life, and noted the inclusion of human rights concepts in primary school curricula. It commended the drop in infant mortality rates, the prohibition of child labour and the establishment of a National Committee concerned with following-up the implementation of CRC. It welcomed measures adopted to safeguard the rights of domestic workers and to address human trafficking.

63. Pakistan was pleased to note that the UNDP 2010 Human Development Report listed Oman among the countries that had made the greatest progress in recent decades in education, health and other sectors. It also noted progress in empowering women in the educational and economic spheres. Their participation in all fields needed to be encouraged. It also noted that the rapid pace of economic development had attracted a large number of foreign workers. It noted that a number of legal and administrative measures had been taken to improve their living and working conditions.

64. Sudan noted achievements in the area of child rights and the judicial system as well as rapid progress towards comprehensive development in all areas, including health, education and living standards. Within the framework of its development efforts Oman had also addressed poverty and unemployment.

65. The Syrian Arab Republic appreciated Oman's sincerity in promoting human rights, including the right to development, and reinforcing the national human rights framework. Syria also highlighted the values of peace, tolerance and justice in the collective culture of the Omani people, noting that Oman accorded the highest priority and respect to human dignity. These values and principles provided a solid basis for the promotion and protection of human rights. Syria noted that Oman had acceded to a large number of human rights instruments and that it pursued constructive cooperation with different human rights mechanisms.

66. Sweden welcomed Oman's ratification of CEDAW, but noted that women continued facing discrimination in law and practice, regarding their personal status and employment and their subordination to male guardians. It noted the existence of the death penalty. Concerning the freedom of expression, Sweden expressed concerns at arbitrary arrests and restrictions by law and practice. Noting that homosexuality was illegal and punished according to Sharia law, it inquired how LGBT rights could be safeguarded.

67. Slovakia commended, inter alia, legislative measures strengthening the legal protection for children, the bill for the care and rehabilitation of persons with disabilities, and the Act on Human Trafficking. Slovakia was concerned that the Press and Publication Law allowed the censoring of publications. It was particularly concerned about reports of harassment of journalists and writers for criticizing government policies in recent years. It noted that women continued to face inequality in areas such as marriage, divorce, inheritance, child custody and employment.

68. Uzbekistan underlined Oman's constitutional human rights protection and the special attention it attached to the rights to health, education and work. Uzbekistan welcomed in particular the establishment of the National Human Rights Commission as independent institution fostering cooperation with civil society. Noting efforts to combat human trafficking, it inquired about results of implementing the Law on Combating Human Trafficking and the work of the National Committee on Human Trafficking.

69. Chile highlighted Oman's efforts in human rights and urged the Government to continue to consolidate the legal framework for the effective promotion and protection of human rights. It congratulated Oman on its determination to reach the second MDG concerning free education, and to reduce the illiteracy rate.

70. The United States of America commended Oman's progress in the areas of education, public health and workers' rights, particularly the increase of schools and elementary school enrolment rates. Increased spending on health services and awareness campaigns had led to greater life expectancy and reduced infant mortality rates. It noted that migrant workers could join unions, and that women were protected from dismissal for reasons of sickness, pregnancy or childbirth. It remained concerned that Omani women married to non-nationals could not pass their citizenship to their children, and at the prevalence of human trafficking. It also noted inequalities with regard to the work conditions of non-Omani workers, especially the lack of a legal minimum wage and work hour limits.

71. Oman noted that during a very short period of time, it had established legal structures for the protection of workers rights in conformity with international standards. Oman had adopted a new labour law in 2003, providing equal rights for all workers.

72. Oman commented on the protection of domestic workers, and noted that regulations to combat trafficking in persons required recruitment agencies to comply with all regulations of the countries of origin of workers, to maintain a registry with information on the workers brought to Oman and to conclude a model contract with the employer to protect the workers and their rights.

73. The labour law did not make a distinction between Omani and migrant workers. Oman respected the rights of workers, including those temporarily employed. Oman had committed itself voluntarily to review a number of labour-related laws, taking account of ILO Conventions 87 and 98, as a prelude to adopting the necessary measures. Oman had also established a hotline to receive complaints from workers whose rights were infringed, so that necessary action could be taken.

74. Oman further noted that it attached great importance to combating all crimes, including trafficking in persons as a contemporary form of slavery, committed by the exploiting persons belonging to vulnerable groups, particularly children, youths and girls. An amendment had been introduced to the Labour Law in order to bring it in conformity with the Law on trafficking in persons.

75. Oman focused on raising general awareness about trafficking in persons, with a focus on victims. In this regard, the National Commission to combat trafficking in persons had produced about two million leaflets in seven different languages that were distributed to all target groups, in addition to posting on websites and dissemination through other media. Oman highlighted its efforts in monitoring trafficking activities and prosecuting perpetrators of trafficking in persons.

76. Oman had an integrated network of information based on international, regional and national cooperation and coordination, with an exchange of information with Interpol as well as UNODC and other relevant agencies. Oman's strategy to combat trafficking in persons focused also on the rehabilitation and reintegration of victims. Oman was committed to combat trafficking in persons by reinforcing existing measures and by working on raising awareness and encouraging victims to report any actions that could fall under the law on combating trafficking in persons.

77. Cuba noted significant progress in education, health, fighting trafficking and rights of persons with disabilities. It highlighted universal access to quality education, progress in the health system, advances regarding the rights of women and children, and that Oman was prepared to strengthen participation of women in the workforce and economic fields. It welcomed efforts aimed at the enrolment of girls in specialized courses and professional trainings. Significant progress had been made with regard to migrant workers.

78. Norway acknowledged Oman's efforts and results in improving the human rights situation. It noted that active participation of civil society was essential to a meaningful UPR process, and that despite freedom of speech by law, freedom of expression remained curtailed in practice.

79. Italy appreciated the measures for advancing equality of women and expressed its confidence that de facto discrimination, especially in relation to marriage, divorce, inheritance and child custody, would be corrected in the future. Italy noted that no executions had been carried out in Oman since 2001. It noted that the amended 2009 Press Law further tightened existing restrictions and extended criminal liability to persons operating communication facilities.

80. Argentina noted the progress which Oman had made in reducing child mortality of children below the age of five, which had been particularly highlighted by the World Health Organization.

81. Nigeria encouraged Oman to continue implementing programmes and policies initiated to fully guarantee the rights of its citizens. It observed that Oman was party to a number of core international human rights instruments, and encouraged it to consider signing or acceding to international human rights instruments such as ICRMW.

82. Poland noted that freedom of expression remained limited in Oman. It expressed concerns over the Press and Publication Law which allowed the censoring of publications perceived as politically, culturally or sexually offensive. It inquired about measures to stop harassment of journalists and writers for criticizing government policies or public services.

83. Nepal highlighted Oman's significant progress in different fields concerning economic, social and cultural rights, particularly in relation to women and children, and in the fields of health and education. It noted that Oman occupied a dignified rank in the global human development index. It highlighted efforts towards establishing the National Human Rights Commission and the National Committee for Combating Human Trafficking.

84. Germany commended Oman for the establishment of the National Human Rights Commission and sought its views regarding a future ICC accreditation. It noted that while the Labour Code affirmed the equality of all workers, this applied to citizens only.

Germany enquired about Oman's plans to grant civil rights to non-citizens, particularly expatriate workers.

85. Australia welcomed progress particularly in economic, social and cultural rights. It was nonetheless concerned that inequality between men and women was enshrined in Omani Law. It appreciated the initiative to raise the minimum working age from 13 to 15 years old, as part of efforts to end child labour. Australia was concerned that access to education was restricted to girls. It was also concerned by new measures further restricting freedom of opinion and expression. Australia remained concerned that capital punishment was a part of Omani Law.

86. China appreciated Oman's establishment of a national legal infrastructure and the incorporation of human rights principles in its law and institutions. It noted the promulgation of the law on combating human trafficking and the establishment of a related national committee. China commended Oman's progress in education and public health as noted by UNDP and its active role in the global initiative on road safety. It hoped the international community would respect Oman for its traditions and customs as an Islamic country.

87. In closing remarks, Oman noted that it was considering the possibility of acceding to the two major international covenants. Oman would be regularly reviewing the conventions it had already acceded to in order to consider the removal of reservations made to them. Oman confirmed its decision to withdraw four of its reservations to the Convention on the Rights of the Child and to limit the scope of its fifth and final reservation. Oman was going to train more people at the national level and increase capacity building in order to prepare for the accession to additional international human rights treaties.

88. Oman indicated that it would ensure coordination in the follow-up to the UPR among all human rights stakeholders, including the national human rights institution and civil society, to evaluate the outcome of the review and to develop national plans and relevant human rights legislations.
